Leaders, issues of the '60s—what were they all about?

By Barbara Lynne Harris
The Tribune

SAN FRANCISCO — In 1967, newspapers wrote about the hippies, the Yippies, the radicals and social activists as if they were people infected with some strange and unpleasant bacteria and their ideas were products of an illness-induced delirium.

Officials described the youth of the '60s as a "doomed" generation turned into zombies by LSD or as "stupid, spoiled middle-class children . . . who smell bad."

The youths of the '60s confounded the establishment with their "far out" clothes and their "mind-blowing" ideas, which included peace, love and an end to racism and U.S. imperialistic wars. To fight for their causes, they used open defiance, blockading Army induction centers, marching with blacks in the South, rioting at the Democratic National Convention and sitting-in on college campuses.

Heroes to some, villains to others, they ripped the nation apart.

Two decades later, with the anniversary of the Haight-Ashbury District Summer of Love a season away, something perplexing remains about those people, their ideas and their tactics that some people believe is worth re-examining and, perhaps, reviving.

At least 500 such people are expected next Saturday and Sunday at what is dubbed a '60s "reunion" sponsored by the University of California Extension Service.

The reunion, a conference called "The Sixties: Its Leaders and Legacy," will bring some of the leading gurus of that time, people such as Abbie Hoffman, one of the Chicago Seven and a founder of the Youth International Party or Yippies; Dr. Benjamin Spock, pediatrician-turned-Vietnam-War-protester and peace activist; Timothy Leary, the counterculture's psychedelic drug folk hero; Betty Friedan, matriarch of the modern feminist movement; "One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest" author Ken Kesey, and civil rights activist and 1968 Olympics athlete Harry Edwards.

The forum has captured the imagination of people from as far away as Belfast and Melbourne, the organizers say.

It was the brainchild of Lynne Kaufman, UC Extension program coordinator, and Peter Car-

State courts would keep Miranda rule, says Justice Mosk

By Philip Hager
Los Angeles Times

SAN FRANCISCO — Many of the nation's state courts will stand by the Miranda rule even if the U.S. Supreme Court abandons the controversial decision requiring police to warn criminal suspects of their rights before they are questioned, the senior member of California's Supreme Court said yesterday.

Justice Stanley Mosk, a 22-year veteran of the California Supreme Court, said the rule is so well established that few states now would revert to a policy of "anything goes at the station house."

The justice, an expert on the growing use of state constitutions to establish individual rights beyond those required by Supreme Court decisions, made his remarks in an address prepared for delivery at an observance of the Constitutional Bicentennial in Philadelphia.

In the speech, Mosk chided President Reagan for his stance on school prayer and criticized Attorney General Edwin Meese III for his repeated attacks on the U.S. Supreme Court's ruling in Miranda vs. Arizona, requiring police to warn suspects of their rights to silence and counsel. A recent Department of Justice report urged an all-out legal assault on the 1966 decision.

Chides Reagan and Meese

"With the roll of drums and the blaring of bugles, Attorney General Meese has led a frontal charge against that bulwark of the Warren Court era," Mosk said. "Will the Supreme Court capitulate?"

Over the years, the Supreme Court has steadily narrowed the scope of the 21-year-old ruling but left its basic requirements intact. But if the justices do decide to abandon the rule altogether, "many, if not most,

Alameda County hospital faces a growing bed crisis

By Jesus Mena
The Tribune

The woman lying on the gurney let out a painful groan as she stared at the dozens of patients crowding the hospital emergency room. Nurses paced frantically about as they sought a bed for her.

At Highland General Hospital, the Alameda County hospital at 1411 East 31st St. in Oakland, an empty bed is rare these days. As many as 10 patients admitted each day may find themselves waiting on a gurney for extended periods as nurses look for ways to free up a bed.

And even if more beds are made available, the hospital lacks sufficient nurses to staff them, as pointed out in citations issued last week by state licensing officials.

Hospital officials say Highland is reeling under the pressure of reduced federal and state funding as well as a dramatic increase in patients. The rise in patient load is far outstripping the resources available to the hospital, they said.

But critics contend that the problems go beyond the limited funding. The hospital

Future of city's rock quarry in planning board's hands

By Roland De Wolk
The Tribune

Oakland's last rock quarry, an immense crater in the city's southern hills, is scheduled either to shut down next month or get permission to operate for at least another 40 years.

Formally known as the Leona Quarry, it has been mined since 1903 for a rock called rhyolite, used for backfill, roads and asphalt.

The owner-operators of the site, Gallagher and Burk of Oakland, are asking the city Planning Commission to extend a special permit to continue mining for at least 40 more years.

During that period, they have told the city, they would dig deeper into the hillside for rhyolite while landscaping the vast gouges.

By the time another 40 million tons of the rock — about half of what's left in the company's 125-acre hill — is pulled out, the pit should no longer look like a pit, according to Tom Rolleri, vice president of Gallagher and Burk.

A recently released study of the proposal projected that the company will take about 1 million tons of rock out of the quarry each year.

But Rolleri pointed out last week that the quarry has traditionally taken out about half that amount annually.

That means, he added, that if the city approves the current proposal, the operation could continue for another 80 years.

U.S. bishops to prepare pope for problems in tour

By Marjorie Hyer
The Washington Post

A delegation of 19 American Catholic bishops will go to Rome this week to discuss plans for Pope John Paul II's tour through the South and West in September and to prepare him for problems he is expected to encounter.

Church leaders have been working for more than a year to organize the complex schedule for the pontiff's second papal visit to the United States, expected to cost American Catholics close to $20 million.

In 1979, when John Paul II was less than a year into his pontificate, the charismatic religious leader captivated the country in a triumphant tour of major metropolitan centers of the Northeast and Midwest.

Eight years and numerous controversies later, some of the magic is gone. Catholics are divided on numerous issues, including discipline of Catholic educators who stray from Rome's teachings. And his itinerary will take him through complex religious, political and theological minefields, ranging from gay rights to birth control, which could result in embarrassing confrontations and demonstrations. A problem that was not a major issue in his first visit is

Rise in campus bigotry worries academia

By Lee Mitgang
The Associated Press

America's colleges, where tolerance is as essential to the pursuit of knowledge as labs and libraries, are being shocked by a wave of intolerance and bigotry.

The upsurge this year in incidents against blacks, women, Jews, homosexuals and others has spawned some harsh self-appraisal by higher education officials.

Many campuses feel their racial climate is healthy. The University of Utah, for example, elected its first female black student president this year.

But campus administrators are beginning to concede that they have often been slow to react to incidents, or too quick to pass them off as isolated or insignificant.

"I don't think there's been a great deal of leadership on the part of university presidents," said Reginald Wilson, head of the office of minority concerns of the American Council on Education, higher education's chief Washington lobby.

The Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith found in its 1986 Audit of Anti-Semitic Incidents that vandalism directed at Jews on campuses rose from 12 incidents in 1985 to 19 in 1986.

While few other overall statistics exist, many observers agree that bigotry is increasing on the nation's campuses.

"There's no question about it:
