GOOD TO THE 'BONE'
See why Fae Myenne Ng is one of the rising Asian-American authors
CUE / C-1

NEW ORLEANS

Trouble on the Bayou
LSU has traveled a rough route to its meeting with Cal
SPORTS DAY / D-1

WEATHER: Slim chances for reinforcements. High 67, low 55. Details, A-12.

TUESDAY: March 16, 1993

The Oakland Tribune.

TWENTY-FIVE CENTS — FRIEND OF THE PEOPLE IT SERVES —  LATE SPORTS FINAL

Federal aid not enough

Companies biting into Apple's core

A SMALL East Bay computer company, Xcellant of Fremont, will help NuTek USA Corp. of Cupertino build what has been called the first legal clone of Apple Computer Inc.'s Macintosh computer.

Details on page D-7

Debate on recall of judge gets ugly

■ Battle rages between NOW chapter, DA's office and the county bar

By Susan Marquez Owen
STAFF WRITER

OAKLAND — A highly charged debate over whether Alameda County Superior Court Judge Stanley Golde should be recalled from office is growing ugly.

The battle pits the East Bay chapter of the National Organization for Women, which contends that Golde is too lenient in sentencing sex criminals, against other judges, attorneys in the District Attorney's Office and the Alameda County Bar Association.

A recent meeting between the women's group that wants Golde removed and a group of attorneys supporting Golde degenerated into a shouting match, with one attorney sticking out her tongue at the leader of the recall effort.

Women are divided over Judge Stanley Golde and have two different versions of the jurist/A-9

Golde's critics charge that his supporters have started a campaign of intimidation — engaging in vociferous confrontations with NOW, members and intensely interviewing county employees who have spoken publicly about the issue.

"My opinion is that they are going to get meaner and more vicious now," said NOW chapter coordinator Caryn Brooks, who chaired the Feb. 16 meeting in

Please see Recall, A-9

A PAINFUL LOSS

PATRICIA YABLONSKI — Staff

Oakland resident Geneva Clark may lose custody of two of her three grandchildren.

Determining the fine line between discipline and abuse of children

By Danielle Cass
STAFF WRITER

OAKLAND — Geneva Clark says county social workers are trying to take her three grandchildren from her because she disciplined them the "good, old- fashioned way" — whipping a belt across their bare bottoms.

The children — ages 9, 7 and 6 — were first taken from the 55-year-old Oakland woman last year after she whipped the 6-year-old boy so fiercely for stealing that the belt broke into three pieces, she said.

Clark was charged with misdemeanor child abuse and has since stopped whipping the children, but Alameda County social workers claim the children would be in danger living in her home, she said.

The grandmother, who appeared in Alameda County Juvenile Court Monday, represents what some social workers call a thin line between corporal discipline and physical abuse.

According to Alameda County Children's Protective Services, Oakland police and emergency room aides at Children's Hospital in Oakland, thousands of parents cross that line every year and lose custody of their children.

"It's not against the law to use physical discipline, but it's too easy to get out of control with physical discipline," said Karen Pico, program manager of the Oakland-based Parental Stress Service. "You may think you have control of your anger and that belt, but you don't."

"Parents don't realize how strong they are," said Michael Hughes, a social worker with Children's Hospital Child Protection Team, which handles abused children brought into the emergency room. The emergency room gets about 20 cases of suspected abuse a month, he said.

Geneva Clark's attorney, Kate Dixon, said she plans to prove that Clark is a fit grandmother at the next hearing, which is scheduled for April 6. Clark's 9-year-old granddaughter still lives with her; the younger children are in custody of the county.

Please see Abuse, A-9

East Bay will need businesses that create jobs

By Edward N. Albro
STAFF WRITER

The East Bay will probably need much more than the $1 billion in federal aid earmarked to help the region recover from the proposed closure of six military bases, defense conversion experts say.

It is not enough simply to retrain workers for new jobs, experts say. Government also has to invest in the kinds of businesses that will create jobs for retrained workers.

In addition, many of the bases have toxic dumps that need to be cleaned up and sewers and roads that need repair before they can be used for housing or industrial parks.

President Clinton last week proposed spending $19.6 billion over four years to offset the harm from closing 31 major military installations and scaling back 134 others. At least $1 billion of that money will come to the Bay Area, which will shoulder about one-quarter of the job losses nationwide from base closings, according to Leon Panetta, head of the Office of Management and Budget.

Major step forward, but not perfect

Clinton's plan is a major step forward from the Bush administration's allocations for defense conversion, but won't fill the bill, experts say.

"That's great. It's a sea change of attitude," said Lee Halterman, a spokesman for Rep. Ron Dellums, D-Oakland. "But we think you need to do about twice that."

Refurbishing just one of the bases slated for closure, the Alameda Naval Air Station, will cost about $500 million, according to Saul Bloom of the Arms Control Research Center in San Francisco.

A major problem will be finding jobs for the thousands of blue-collar workers at the military bases.

"There aren't easy answers for that," said Michael Closson of the Center for Economic Conversion.

Jobs required after retraining

Retraining programs are no use if there are no jobs for the workers when they finish. So government may need to invest in local companies that can hire them, Closson said.

In the East Bay, for instance, federal funds could be used to help the Port of Oakland expand or to fund airline repair firms. Both businesses could employ workers from the naval air station.

Many of the workers could also be employed cleaning up toxic messes, both at military bases and elsewhere.

Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-San Francisco, last week introduced a bill to spend $60 million over three years to train former service people, base employees and young people to clean up toxic wastes.

Rescue workers fail to find 24 hikers

■ 2 days later, toll of storm is at 171

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Rescuers failed to find 24 hikers missing in the snowy southern Appalachians on Monday after dozens of others trudged through deep drifts to safety. Highway crews strained to reach thousands snowbound at home and in shelters by the weekend blizzard, and the death toll rose to 171.

In addition to the deaths — reported from Cuba to Canada — 32 crewmen were missing after a freighter sank Monday off Nova Scotia, and 16 mariners were missing in waters around Florida.

Most major airports moved back toward normal operations. But because of delays in the East, "normal won't be here until Tuesday or Wednesday," said Mary Francis Fagan of American Airlines at Chicago's O'Hare Airport.

Commuters in big cities struggled to get to work. Many Pennsylvania businesses, schools, courthouses and state and local offices remained closed Monday.

A deep freeze that followed the storm was estimated to have caused millions of dollars in damage to Southern crops, from tomatoes to tobacco, blueberries to peaches.

Teams from North Carolina and Tennessee searched the mountains of Great Smoky Mountains National Park for remaining members of a group of 117 teen-agers and adults from a Detroit-area private school who had been hiking on an annual spring break trek when the storm struck.

More storm news/ A-9

AP

A helicopter lowers a medic to check on stranded people in Cherokee National Forest.

Chance to reverse closing of bases

By Meredith K. Wadman
WASHINGTON BUREAU

WASHINGTON — Emphasizing that each community will have a chance to convince the Base Closure and Realignment Commission to change the hit list, the chairman said Monday the group may consider halting construction of a new aircraft carrier port in Everett, Wash.

"We'll look at that very carefully, yes, absolutely," said James Courter, who heads the independent commission that will spend the next 107 days deciding which of 31 major military facilities recommended for closure by Secretary of Defense Les Aspin should stay on that list.

The list includes six major Bay Area facilities: Alameda Naval Air Station, the Naval Aviation Depot in Alameda, Oakland Naval Hospital, Oakland Naval Supply Center, Treasure Island Naval Station and Mare Island Naval Shipyard in Vallejo.

Courter said that affected communities would have the opportunity to convince the commission to change the list.

"Anything is possible," he said. ". . . .we're not going to close anything" before we visit the base and give the community the opportunity to present its best case.

The status of the port in Everett is relevant to the fate of the Alameda Naval Air Station because Everett, with San Diego, would effectively replace the nuclear carrier-harboring capacity at Alameda under recommendations made by the military to

Please see Bases, A-12

Good morning . . .

Slow recovery

ABAG says negative job and income trends that began in the Bay Area in the mid-1980s mean recovery from the recession will be slow. [D-7]

Read, then recycle
We use recycled paper

Gardner tells why he quit

City Manager Henry Gardner calls a news conference to explain why submitted his resignation last week. He says he hasn't decided what he wants to do next. [B-1]

ALMANAC	A-2	CUE	C-1	MOVIES	C-3
JUDY BERKLEY	A-2	EDITORIALS	A-10	SCOREBOARD	D-6
BUSINESS DAY	D-7	TIM GOFF	A-3	MONTE POULE	D-4
CLASSIFIED	B-6/C-8	ANN LANDERS	C-6	SPORTS DAY	D-1
COMICS	C-4	LOCAL NEWS	B-1	CARL STEWARD	D-1
CROSSWORD	C-4	LOTTERY	A-2	WEATHER	A-12

© 1993 Alameda Newspaper Group 120th year, No. 75

Classified ads....268-TRIB